Annexure 1

Key terms of employment that survive post-separation of an employment agreement

During your employment with the Company, you had access to a considerable amount of information that is not generally known outside of the Company, said information may have included but not limited to business and development plans, technical data such as designs, specifications, or algorithms, unpublished financial information such as orders, cost or charge rates, and business practices and procedure as well as personnel and organizational data. It may have been disclosed to you orally or in writing or may be contained in Company's product or a third party may have disclosed it to you (through the Company) under a non-disclosure agreement by virtue of which you may have had access to such third-party information. The Company considers all such information, and any other information, that gives the Company a competitive advantage over others who do not know it as confidential and/or proprietary irrespective of whether it was specifically marked as such or not.

Further, all inventions and copyrightable works (including software) relating to Company business that you created, conceived, or reduced to practice alone or with others while you were an employee are the sole property of the Company. As an employee, you have agreed to disclose and assign all such inventions to the Company and to cooperate with the Company in any legal formalities necessary to secure those rights, at the Company's expense. Similarly, all documents and materials that were furnished to you as an employee, as well as all records, documents, and materials that you created as an employee, including codes, formulas, processes, and notebooks, remain the property of the Company.

If you should later discover any such items or copies in your possession that were overlooked, we ask that you forward them to the Company promptly.

Former employees shall not misuse or misrepresent the name of the Company on social media platforms including but not limited to LinkedIn, Facebook, YouTube, Twitter, WhatsApp, and Snapchat ("Platforms"), for their own benefits and must update their employment status immediately after their exit from the Company. The Company reserves the right to take legal or any appropriate action against any former employees who are found misrepresenting facts related to their relationship with the Company on these Platforms.

The Obligation of confidentiality must be respected throughout the term of the contract, and once it ends, for a period of 12 months likewise, it undertakes to maintain the most absolute reserve and confidentiality regarding the knowledge acquired by its relationship with the company. The prohibition of competition established in this section will have a duration of 12 months, from the end of the employment relationship.

While we naturally assume that you intend to fulfill all your obligations to the Company faithfully, we thought it best to send this reminder to avoid any possible misunderstandings. We are also enclosing some frequently asked questions concerning the Company's intellectual property and invite you to contact us if you have any questions concerning this letter or your ongoing obligations.

IP FAQs for Departing Employees

The purpose of this memorandum is to answer some frequently asked questions concerning the ongoing obligations of employees with respect to Company intellectual property.

What is “proprietary information”? Simply put, Proprietary information is any information in any form that is known or used by a Company, and which gives that Company an opportunity to gain a competitive advantage over others who do not know or use it. Proprietary information also includes any non-public information that has been shared in confidence with the understanding that it will not be disclosed further. Proprietary information may also be referred to as “trade secrets” or “confidential information”. The slight legal differences are inconsequential.

What are my obligations for proprietary information? As the name implies, proprietary information is legal property as surely as tangible inventory and equipment. As a part of the employment relationship, the law imposes a strict duty on every employee not to use or disclose an employer’s proprietary information. No formal agreement is required. A former employee may be held financially responsible for any damage caused by misappropriating information just as for misappropriating any physical asset. In some cases, criminal liability may also result.

How long does this obligation last? The obligation continues for as long as the information concerned remains non- public. Once the information becomes available to you from a source other than Company you are free from any further obligation to Company, unless, of course, some other legal restriction such as a patent or copyright governs the use of the information.

What job-related information can I use? You are always free to use all the generalized knowledge and skills that you brought to the Company or accumulated while an employee. For example, if you are a chemical engineer, you are naturally entitled to use all your engineering knowledge and skills. You are only limited from using the formulas, processes, and procedures that are known to or used by Company and not generally known or practiced elsewhere.

What tangible records may I retain? Any software, documents, or records, including machine-readable data that were furnished to you, remain Company property. Any software documents or records that you created as part of your job or which contain or reveal any proprietary information for the Company, are also Company property and must be returned to the Company. Your issued patents and published works are not proprietary information by definition, and you may retain copies for your personal use, subject to the normal patent and copyright limitations.

What are the copyright limitations? The copyright in any written work, including software, visual or audio-visual works that are created by an employee, automatically belongs to their employer at the instant of creation. While you may retain a copy of any published work that you created, you may not make additional copies or prepare another work derived from it by, for example, translating, or editing from it, without written permission from the Company.

What are my obligations for inventions? Inventions that relate to any business or research projects of the Company that were made, conceived, or reduced to practice while an employee and in some cases, for a period afterward, belong to the Company. If you are an inventor under any invention disclosure or patent application, your assistance may be needed to execute documents or prosecute an application. If your assistance is needed, every effort will be made to minimize any inconvenience to you and your new employer.

What if Company IP would benefit my new employer? No ethical employer is interested in receiving or benefiting from any intellectual property that they are not entitled to use lawfully. In any event, the likelihood of injunction, money damages, and even criminal sanctions make such activities a poor business risk. If you or your new employer believes that any Company intellectual property would be useful, the likelihood is that the Company would be willing to consider an appropriate licensing arrangement that will eliminate any such risk.
